The Sundance Film Festival will be going digital in 2021, allowing a wider audience than ever to be the first to see the films on its program. And now, at last, that list of titles is live.

The 2020 festival, which took place as usual in Park City, Utah, in January, brought the debuts of some of the most exciting titles of 2020, including Palm Springs, Minari, Black Bear, Miss Juneteenth, and Promising Young Woman.

Of course, 2021 can't look quite the same, and it will play out across a custom digital platform, drive-in screenings, and socially distanced local events. "This festival is a singular response to a singular year — both in design and curation — and we are excited about the new dimensions of possibility it will reveal. But at its core is something that speaks to our most enduring values," said festival director Tabitha Jackson in the release announcing the slate of films. "For thousands of years humans have gathered to tell stories and make meaning. In this pandemic year, we gather to celebrate a constellation of artists with unique perspectives that express this current moment and who together are saying, 'We exist. This is who we are. And this is what we see.'"

“Of course, the pandemic year demanded adaptation,” added Sundance Institute executive director Keri Putnam in the release. “On a deeper level, we also recognize the urgency of supporting independent storytellers at a time of great upheaval in the film and media fields. We’re proud this edition of the Festival is fiercely independent, and will reach people everywhere.”

With over half of the program made by first-time directors, “a sense of discovery remains true to us at Sundance,” said festival director of programming Kim Yutani. “This year’s festival presents irrefutable evidence that despite the challenges, the independent voice is as strong as ever.”
